A single question can open a door you never knew was there.

Question

What question shifted something inside of you today?

Imagine a friend doesn't return your phone call.

Your first thought might be: "Why are they ignoring me?"

But instead of stopping there, you become curious.

What opened for me?

What new window of understanding appeared?

You ask yourself:

What emotions came up for me?

Why did I immediately assume I was being rejected?

Has this feeling shown up before?

What might this situation be helping me understand about myself?

What I understand now

What truth feels clearer than it did before?

As you reflect, you may realize:

"I noticed I often assume silence means rejection. This experience reminded me of an old fear of not feeling important to others. My friend may simply be busy, but my reaction revealed something I hadn't fully healed."

Next Question

What curiosity has emerged from this understanding?

The situation wasn't just about a missed phone call.

It became an opportunity for deeper understanding.

Your next question may be: "Where did I learn to tell myself this story?"
